The Problem Traditional Church History Studies are Often Inaccessible Traditional approaches to church history often rely on heavily academic texts filled with Latin terms intricate theological debates and a chronological structure that can feel disconnected from the human experiences driving the events This can lead to several pain points

- Jargon overload Understanding terms like Donatism Nestorianism or Pelagianism can feel impossible without a theological degree
- Lack of context Dates and events are often presented in isolation failing to connect the historical context to the broader sociopolitical landscape
- Dry and unengaging presentation The sheer volume of information coupled with a lack of engaging narratives can make the subject feel dull and irrelevant
- Difficulty applying lessons Without a clear understanding of the human element and the lessons learned the historical narrative can feel distant and disconnected from contemporary faith
